The Soldlers of the Confederacy.

At the first summons to arms, the youth and manhood of the South responded with a degree of enthusiasm which had seldom if ever been witnessed. The fields, the workshops, the country houses, even the schools and colleges were at once deserted, and it was necessary to repress rather than encourage the fierce ardor which threatened to go far beyond the exigency. The sound of martial music was to be heard everywhere; on every In seeds of laure's in the earth, hill raw militia were undergoing the drill, and the lights of the camp-fires were seldom out of sight from the Po tomac to the Rio Grande.
